Two specific aspects of environmental change affected by population dynamics: climate change and land-use change. Implications for policy and further research. Hunter concludes that population dynamics have important environmental implications but that the sheer size of population represents only one important variable in this complex relationship.

mechanisms by which environmental changes altered species invasion rates. The three environmental factors interacted when modifying species growth rates, intra- and interspecific competition, causing the impact of each environmental change on species dynamics to depend crucially on the state of other aspects of the environment.

The real story of temporal dynamics of urbanization-driven environmental changes needs a long-term study. We hypothesize that when a rural or suburban area turns to be urbanized, anthropogenic metals will be elevated in the environmental matrices and the existing urban-rural/suburban pattern of metal spatial distribution will be diffused.
